Milo's summer break

Milo jumps out of bed this morning, eager to start the day. His summer break from school has begun and this year is different. Milo's mom works at a nursing home so she can't stay home with him all summer. Usually, Milo spends time at his friends' houses when they aren't away on holiday and sometimes he visits his grandparents. He always has a nice summer break but he has often wished it would be a bit more exciting.

This year, his wish has come true. A summer camp has opened up in his neighbourhood and Milo was able to get a spot. Filled with excitement, he quickly eats his breakfast and jumps on his bicycle, racing off to the camp.

At first, Milo doesn't notice anything strange. He parks his bicycle and walks past a long row of cars and parents dropping off their kids. It's not until he joins a large group in front of one of the cabins that he notices the difference between him and the other campers. The other kids are small. Like seven or eight, so at least five years younger than him.

The camp counsellors, three college students named Nadia, Ben and Julie, are as confused as Milo. On their list, it says Milo is supposed to be 8 years old.

Milo's face falls. Somehow, he has ended up at a camp for little kids. He turns to leave, but Julie stops him.

"You don't have to go," she says. "I know it's not what you signed up for, but will you stay anyway?"

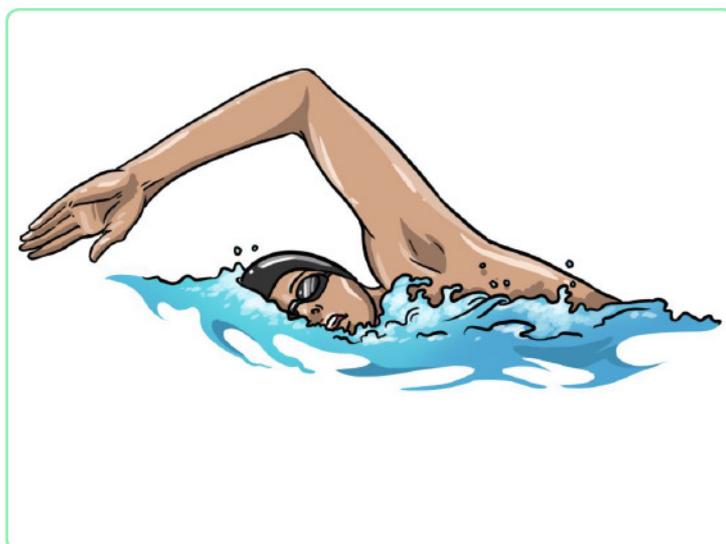

Milo considers. His friends are away on holiday right now and his mom is at work. He looks at Nadia and Ben, who are both nodding and smiling.

"Okay, I will stay," Milo says.

The week goes by fast. Milo participates in all of the planned activities. He swims, goes on nature walks and bakes bread over a bonfire, and he spends most of his time helping the kids. He's enjoying himself more than he thought he would. At the end of the week, the counsellors ask if he wants to come back on Monday, and Milo says yes immediately.

"You have been such a big help with the kids," Julie says. "We would like to make you a junior-counsellor, if you want?"

She hands him a vest like the one they're wearing and an envelope. Inside, there's 50 dollars. Milo is speechless. They're offering him a job! Not only does he get to have fun every day, but now he will be able to save up some money too. He puts on the vest immediately and grins. He can't wait to show his mom when he gets home.
